Charlie Kaufman took two completely different genres, romantic comedy and sci-fi-memory-thriller, and combined them to create a masterpiece unlike anything that had been made before. However, what really made it successful was the everyday, basic connection that almost everyone has to the issues presented in the story.

An idea for genre mashing could include using romance, action, and sci-fi together. An example could be where one person is who has pretty much done nothing with his life is kidnapped and forced to go back in time in order to prevent something from happening in the future. However, while he is there, he falls in love while trying to accomplish his task. As a result of falling in love, despite getting done what he came to do, his relationship with this woman develops and that ends up changing the course of history. Since he ends up marrying the girl from the past, which is now the present, it changes the entire course of his life. In turn, he never has kids (with someone else), he never gets kidnapped, and so he never goes back in time. Because of all this, the man doesn't have anyone buy the girl he ended up marrying, but still remembers how he traveled through time and met her. Despite meeting the love of his life, he is half empty by missing and having the pain of realizing his children never existed because he met this women.
